ASIIMWE JOY TURYAMWIJUKA examined the relations among community actors on the solid waste management hierarchy of Kampala city. The study responded to the accumulation of urban solid wastes in the informal settlements and the absence of organized community participation. She used qualitative methods to analyze the nature of relations held among community-based innovation initiatives and the administration of Kampala Capital City Authority (KCCA) along the solid waste management hierarchy of Kampala City. The study revealed direct, indirect, and networked relations within informal settlements based on the socio-economic interests for recovery of some lucrative materials for recycling. However, such networks were not utilized for urban solid waste management in the bureaucratic structure of KCCA. As a result, KCCA falls short of integrated sustainable urban solid waste management attributes, leaving out important community actors. These findings inform the urban authorities to recognize and build relations with community-based networks, in the framework of village urban councils. By the nature of urban communities which are diverse, community-based networks hold the potential to boost compliance with the solid waste management ordinance and cause transformative behavior change. Therefore, KCCA should fast-track the operationalization of street committees as the unit for effective community participation in urban solid waste management. The study was self-funded with contributions from AWELIS project. It was supervised by Professor Shuaib Lwasa from the Institute of Social Studies of Erasmus University in the Netherlands and Associate Professor Rose Bakenegura Namara of Uganda Management Institute.

PAUL MWAMBU analyzed the adoption of technological innovations under the single-spine agricultural extension system among farmer groups in Kiryandongo and Rukungiri Districts of Uganda. This was premised on the view that despite the introduction of the single spine agricultural extension service as a policy intervention, to increase the adoption of innovations for agricultural production and productivity in 2016, four years down the road, these aspirations have not been realized. The research adopted a qualitative explanatory case study research design. The findings indicated that the inability of the policy implementer to actualize the provisions due to limited resources and weak coordination mechanisms, especially at the decentralized levels was a critical factor. Harnessing indigenous knowledge in facilitating technological adoption was undermined by the inability of extension workers to make use of the social capital. The limited attention given to the governance structures negatively impacted the adoption of agricultural innovations. The decision to adopt an innovation by farmers was influenced by the level of awareness of the nature of the innovation and the innovativeness of the individuals. Farmers in homogeneous communities adopted innovations faster compared to their counterparts. The study presents a model upon which re-conceptualization and reconstruction of the adoption of agricultural technological innovations can be hinged as contributions to new knowledge. The study was self-funded and was supervised by Associate Professor Gerald Kagambirwe Karyeija and Dr. Edgar Kateshumbwa Mwesigye, both of Uganda Management Institute

MARTIN MUHEREZA investigated Electricity Policy and Structural reforms in Metropolitan Kampala with implications for informal settlements. The study was guided by New Public Management Theories, in particular, the Public Choice Theory which posits that economic tools are pertinent in addressing traditional problems of public management. The mixed methods study inquired of consumers' accessibility, affordability, usability, and reliability of the electricity services through semi-structured interviews and focus group discussions. The Thesis revealed that residents in informal settlements pay higher electricity tariffs than those living in formal settlements because of illegal connections hither to refer as "looping". The study further revealed a poor link between global developmental benefits of reforms and structural reforms in Uganda. The Thesis concluded that electricity sector reforms are not a panacea for improvement in the welfare of households in informal settlements. Instead, there is need for institutional and financial reforms, and deliberate policy implementation aimed at welfare improvement. The study recommended alignment of reforms to other planning departments in the government to help in the implementation process; rolling out a special program for increasing access and usage of electricity in informal settlements; and selective adoption of elements of the electricity reform agenda contingent upon the factors existing in the country. The study was self-sponsored and was supervised by Prof. Costa Hofisi of North West University and Associate Prof. Sylvester Kamanyire Kugonza, Uganda Management Institute.

JOSEPH WASSWA ZIRITWAWULA examined the implementation of noise pollution control policy in urban-Uganda, focusing on citizens' perceptions and compliance in Kampala, particularly Lubaga Urban Division. Citizens' perceptions were sought on noise pollution, its control policy implementation and the noise producers' levels of policy compliance. It was a cross-sectional case study, covering the time scope of 2018- 2022. Key informant interviews were conducted with purposively selected participants from KCCA, NEMA and noise producing facilities within Lubaga Urban Division. Additionally, focus group discussions were held with purposively selected citizens from selected noise producing facilities in Lubaga. The study findings revealed several implementation gaps, including failure by KCCA and NEMA to accord due priority to noise pollution control issues; inadequate resource allocation; inadequate communication; poor coordination of enforcement activities; inadequate education and sensitisation on policy awareness among stakeholders. Several recommendations were made to address the identified implementation gaps. These include soundproofing loud noise- producing entertainment and worshipping places; setting operating time limits; and outlawing certain excessive noise producing activities. Guided by Fiedler's Contingency theory and Van Meter and Van Horn's (1993) model of policy implementation, a noise-recipient-centred model of policy implementation and noise pollution control, code-named VVENT (Voluntary Village Environmental Noise (control) Team), was developed. The model enlists other auxiliary policy actors, such as, local police, religious organizations and VVENTS, to participate in policy implementation and noise pollution control efforts at the grassroots level. The study was self-funded; and was supervised by Associate Professor Rose Bakenegura Namara and Dr. Ivan Kiiza Twinomuhwezi, both, of Uganda Management Institute.

PETER ADOKO OBICCI investigated how institutional framing and stakeholder engagement mediated the relationship between authentic leadership and physical asset management in Ugandan local governments. The study was driven by the belief that all aspects must be integrated into effective physical asset management to produce synergistic outcomes. Peter utilized authentic leadership, institutional and stakeholder theories to es-establish the theoretical groundwork for the study and to offer a conceptual and useful model that would serve as a framework to assist practitioners in Ugandan local governments with the successful physical asset management practices process. Utilizing sequential explanatory mixed methods research, 283 respondents from 97 local governments in the districts of Gulu, Kitgum, Pader and Amuru in Acoliland, northern Uganda, participated in the study. It has been established that physical asset management and authentic leadership are positively and significantly correlated. This relationship was mediated by institutional framing and stakeholder engagement. The study reveals that organizations that successfully manage their physical assets while taking human organizational factors into account outperform those that do not. The study bridged a gap in the literature on physical asset management by elucidating the roles of authentic leadership, institutions and stakeholders. It also highlights the underprivileged country context, especially in Uganda, which is often disregarded in research on the management of physical assets and public procurement viewpoints. Peter created the Physical Asset Management Practices Operational (PAMPO) framework, which is most significant. Local government employees will now have the chance to critically examine a workable and adaptable way to address challenges in managing physical assets, which not only fills in the gaps in practical knowledge that exist in physical asset management research but also helps to address the difficulties in executing physical asset management practices. The study was self-funded, under the direction of Associate Professor Godfrey Mugurusi of the Norwegian University of Science and Technology and Associate Professor Gerald Kagambirwe Karyeija of Uganda Management Institute.

HARRIET AYIORWOTH examined the knowledge-sharing dynamics between academic staff at Uganda Management Institute (UMI) and practitioners from various organizations. Motivated by the overlooked perspectives of practitioners in existing literature, Ayiorwoth's study, guided by the Engaged Scholarship Model, aimed to highlight the collaborative creation of knowledge by academic and non-academic stakeholders to address contemporary societal challenges. Employing qualitative methods such as interviews, participant observation, and document analysis, the research focused on knowledge-sharing practices at UMI, going beyond conventional notions of knowledge transfer to practitioners. The findings uncovered that participatory knowledge-sharing practices are utilized by UMI's academic staff and practitioners, fostering the integration of practical and theoretical knowledge primarily through teaching and training. While UMI's training and consultancy were found to be highly relevant to managers and leaders in Uganda, the study revealed challenges in research and innovation due to limited funding. Recommendations included increased funding from institutional, government, and other stakeholders to enhance research and innovation at UMI. The study was self-funded and supervised by Professor Daniel Geiger from the University of Hamburg and Associate Professor Wilberforce Turyasingura of the Uganda Management Institute.

TOPHIL OWINO ODOY Investigated the relationship between human resource management practices and health service delivery in Uganda. The study was underpinned by Pragmatism (positivism and interpretivism) research philosophies using Quantitative and Qualitative research approaches. Data was collected from Mukuju, Mulanda and Nagongera HCIVs using questionnaire, interview schedule and documents review checklist. The study established that hiring and staff development practices have significant relationship with HSD in HC IVs; while, performance evaluation practices did not. The study recommended that Government of Uganda should recruit adequate essential health workers like Anesthetic Officers, Senior Health Educators and Medical Officers of Health; and thereafter, train them in attitude change towards patients; Increase salaries and allowances of health workers in the HCIVs; Provide adequate medicines and drugs; ambulances, theatre equipment, X-ray machines, Personal Protection Equipment (PPEs) in the HC IVs; Commit 15% of its budget to towards health sector; Pay village health teams (VHTs) some allowances to help improve monitoring of health service delivery; and construct more latrines in HC IVs; Performance evaluation practices be re-designed and improved upon; Practical performance evaluations and feedback mechanisms be introduced. The study was funded by Uganda Management Institute (UMI) and was supervised by Professor Peter Baguma from Makerere University and Dr. Lazarus Nabaho from Uganda Management Institute.
