ELIZABETH ACOMO investigated the use of educational research in informing Technical Vocational Education and Training (TVET) policy development in Uganda. The study was underpinned by interpretivist research philosophy. The study used backward tracing within an exploratory single case study design, thematic analysis and inductive reasoning about the 2019 TVET policy for Uganda to uncover key methods and sources of evidence that can bridge policy gaps and influence policy decision-making processes. Key findings revealed that regulatory risk assessments, policy reviews, changing trends, industry demands, and educational research highlighted policy gaps. It also identified that TVET benchmarking reports, government risk assessment reports, and education research findings were crucial evidence sources for policymakers. The study concluded that adequately communicated research evidence is vital for policymakers to justify policy gaps, set priorities, draft policy, and seek approval. The study recommends policymakers should engage researchers, exploit research repositories, use evidence selection criteria, and employ a research-for-policy strategy to produce evidence-based policy. Elizabeth's work highlights the importance of using well-communicated research evidence to set policy priorities and objectives, thus significantly contributing to evidence-based policymaking. The study was privately sponsored and was supervised by Associate Professor Rose Namara, from Uganda Management Institute and Associate Professor Allan Katwalo from Uganda Management Institute.

DAVID LWANGA investigated how Kampala City Council (KCC) transformed into Kampala Capital City Authority (KCCA) and attained its institutional legitimacy amidst conflicting pressures for change. Thus explaining how change initiatives could be positively embraced, resulting in self-reinforcing sequences of institutional legitimacy. The study was underpinned by a dialectical paradigm (multiple worldviews) where the researcher that relies on this paradigm uses both paradigms, that is, constructivism and positivism, in a dialogue during a study instead of using a single paradigm to guide a study. The study was divided into 2 phases: the first phase of the study began with a qualitative strand; it required an inclination toward constructivism principles where multiple perspectives are considered to obtain an in-depth understanding of the transformation process and subsequent attainment of institutional legitimacy. During the second quantitative phase, the underlying philosophical assumption shifted to the post-positivism philosophical strand to guide the measuring and testing of the instrument and generalizability of results. During the process of integrating the two sets of data in response to the mixed-methods research question, a post-positivism stance was considered. Through interviews and documentary review, qualitative data was collected from 7 key informants, from which the saturation point was attained, and these were members of KCCA's administrative and political arms. During the second phase, quantitative data was collected from a larger population, that is, KCCA councillors, division councillors, and town clerks, by way of administering closed-ended questionnaires to the selected participants. The study found that two categories of pressures were behind the transformation of KCC to KCCA: the main category was the justifiable pressures, which had justified reasons for the transformation, and the minor category was the unjustifiable pressures, which could not be supported by vivid evidence. Furthermore, the study revealed that the team behind the transformation had to strategically conform to the demands of the pressures pushing for the transformation to secure its legitimacy. Later, these were supported by contingency strategies adopted to enhance the attainment of KCCA's institutional legitimacy. Both community-oriented and institutional-oriented strategies to deal with the resisters to the transformation were adopted. In furtherance of this, the three alternative hypotheses were confirmed, thus a strong positive correlation between the three predictors and the KCCA's attainment of institutional legitimacy. Hence, these quantitative findings clearly support the initial qualitative findings on how KCCA attained its institutional legitimacy amidst conflicting pressures for change. Consequently, it is prudent to conclude that KCCA is a legitimate entity enjoying both normative and sociological legitimacy. The study recommends as follows: KCCA needs to guard against transformational degeneration and also develop and implement strategies to ensure sustainability of the transformation and preserve its achievements; KCCA should reconstruct the broken systems of service delivery; there should be continuous amendment of the KCCA Act; and the government should regulate politicians and political activities in the city to insulate service delivery. The study was funded by friends and family members and was supervised by Prof. Dr. Daniel Geiger from the University of Hamburg, Germany, and Dr. Stella Kyohairwe from the Uganda Management Institute, Kampala.

MUHANGI WAKABI BERNARD studied the relationship between managerial competences and financial performance in Microfinance Institutions (MFIs) of Uganda while examining the mediating effect of competitive advantage and stakeholder management's moderating effect therein. Following a post-positivist research philosophy, the study adopted a Sequential Explanatory mixed methods Design (QUAN-Qual). The study covered Ugandan Microfinance institutions which are members of the Association of Microfinance Institutions in Uganda (AMFIU) in all regions of Uganda. Using three underpinning theories - Upper echelon's theory, Stakeholder theory and the Resource Based view the mediating effect of competitive advantage and moderating effect of stakeholder management in the relationship between managerial competences and financial performance was investigated. Data were collected using questionnaires (for managers of MFIs), interviews (for Board members) and document review (for administrative data). By adopting Pearson correlation analysis, study established that managerial competences were strongly and positively related to financial performance of MFIs in Uganda. Using hierarchical regression, it was also confirmed that competitive advantage partially mediates the relationship between managerial competences and financial performance of MFIs in Uganda. Finally, the study found a partial moderation effect of stakeholder management in the relationship between managerial competences and financial performance. The study concludes that MFIs can only benefit if they appreciate the competences (skills, knowledge and abilities) of management in their recruitment and retention processes and strategy. The study also concludes that MFIs that survive competition are only those that nourish their competitive strategies and refine their strategic direction, thus improving their financial performance. In addition, the study concludes that managerial competences interact with stakeholder management to affect the financial performance of Uganda's MFIs, with stakeholder management taking a moderating role. The study therefore recommends that 1) MFIs should design appropriate policies aimed at attracting competent managers with the relevant skills, knowledge, and abilities; 2) Besides investment in physical capital, MFIs should devise deliberate competitive strategies such as focus, differentiation and cost leadership. They should invest in programs aimed at enhancing their ability to develop or acquire a set of attributes (or execute actions) that allow them to outperform their competitors; and 3) Managers of MFIs should consider investing heavily in harnessing and maintaining good relations with their respective stakeholders if they are to survive the stiff competition in the market. The study was jointly funded by the Candidate and Mountains of the Moon University (MMU); and was supervised by Professor (Dr.) Badar Alam Iqbal from Monarch University, Zug

(Switzerland) and Dr. Saturninus Kasozi-Mulindwa from Uganda Management Institute.

LETICIA NAKIMULI successfully defended her PhD dissertation titled "Effect of group identification on women economic empowerment. A case of the project to empower women through savings and loans associations (PEWOSA)", Supervised by Prof. Joseph Ntayi (Makerere University Business School) and Dr. Florence Bakibinga Sajjabi (Uganda Management Institute). She investigated whether group centrality, in-group affect and in-group ties plus business support services had helped women achieve economic empowerment. Previous studies had adopted different theoretical models such as feminist theories and gender needs theories in addressing issues of women economic empowerment while ignoring women's interests. This study applied the social identity theory and economic empowerment theory in studying the effect of group identification on financial autonomy, economic security, and decision-making among women supported by PEWOSA. The research was guided by the post-positivist philosophical orientation, which advocates for the utilization of both quantitative and qualitative research methods with the aim of achieving a nuanced understanding of economic empowerment amongst women supported by PEWOSA. The findings showed that group centrality, in-group affect and in-group ties influenced economic empowerment, though the association between centrality and financial autonomy, centrality and economic security, in-group ties and decision making were not supported. The major recommendation of the study was that for women to fully achieve economic empowerment through the use of a 'group model' then the Promoters of these groups must promote transparent and fair leadership: Group leaders should adhere to principles of transparency, fairness, and inclusivity. Implementing clear guidelines for decision-making, ensuring equal opportunities for all members, and addressing any perceived favouritism could foster trust and enhance the positive emotional attachment within the groups. The study was self-funded; and was supervised by Prof. Joseph Ntayi Makerere University Business School and Dr. Florence Bakibinga Sajjabi (Mrs)

NANSUBUGA ROSEMARY investigated 'The influence of Curriculum Design on Career Choices among secondary school students in Wakiso District, in Central Uganda'. The study was underpinned by pragmatism (positivism and interpretivism), a research philosophy using quantitative and qualitative research approaches. The study was guided by three (3) objectives: (i) To establish the influence of curriculum content on career choices among students in secondary schools, (ii) To assess the influence of curriculum instruction on career choices among students in secondary schools, and to (iii) To analyse the influence of curriculum assessment on career choices among students in secondary schools. Data was collected from NCDC, UNEB, and selected secondary schools using questionnaire, interview guide and documents review checklist. The Tyler Raph Curriculum and Holland theories underpinned the study to understand the linkage between curriculum design and students' career choices. It was revealed that teaching methods have the most significant impact on career choices (55%), followed by course content (13.4%) and assessment strategies (11.3%). Further, findings from the students revealed that assessment strategies were the most influential factor (37.2%), followed by teaching methods (31.4%) and course content (17.2%). Hence, the curriculum accounted for nearly half of the factors influencing students' career choices. However, other than the aspects of curriculum design, it was also revealed that, to a large extent, both Institutional and external factors influenced students' career choices. The study concluded that the content imparted and methods used significantly shape learners' professional and career aspirations. The study recommends that the actors of curriculum development should continuously involve key stakeholders for relevant content, and continuous teacher professional development should be made a priority to ensure that the teachers are up-to-date with the content and the preferred modes of delivery such as interactive projects, and differentiated teaching methods that inspire students toward specific career paths. Educators can better guide students to make informed, preferred career decisions relevant to content and intentional instructional approaches. The study was self-sponsored and supervised by Associate Professor Maria Vincent Kaguhangire-Barifaijo and Dr. Nyenje Ida Lubwama from Uganda Management Institute.
